You have read the following message on an Internet discussion forum:

I have recently come across a text that has given me food for thought:

Why can't I find a soulmate?

Dr. Joe Dispenza, a neuroscientist, speaker, writer and educator claimed recently in one of his interviews: "I always say, take out a piece of paper, write down everything you want in that person, and then become it. ... Would you go out with you? [That] is really the fundamental question." You need to embody the qualities you look for in other people.

Indeed, I had never stopped to consider it. After thinking long, I am still puzzled. You hear people say that when looking for a partner, we tend to focus on the person's qualities, but not on what we bring to the table. In my opinion, luck plays a decisive role because we evolve over time.

What do you reckon about this? Please, leave a comment below.

Teamwork has become decisive in today's highly digital world. Research shows that successful teamwork has many positive effects, including a better collaboration among team members or an enjoyable environment.

Your teacher at the Language School has requested proposals on how to build teamwork at school or work. The most innovative proposals will be published in the school's magazine.

Write a proposal suggesting ways to communicate successfully with team members, how to give your team autonomy, and how to ensure that the team members benefit from each other's skills.

OPTION B

You have recently taken up a fiction-writing workshop. This week's task requires the participants to write a story that must begin with a well-known line from a movie: "I think this is the beginning of a beautiful friendship" (Casablanca, 1942). The best story will be published in the UN Global Citizen Journal to mark the International Day of Friendship and to promote friendship as a form of human solidarity.

Write a short story following the above-mentioned first line to celebrate friendship.
